As Viktor Orbán noted in conclusion of the talk, to understand the situation in the Middle East and the situation in which Christian communities there have found themselves, the most optimal question was 'to ask those who live there, to ask heads of churches present in that region'.

'We have met personally and now can discuss what politicians can do to relieve your life in that region.'

Therefore, thank you very much for having accepted our invitation', he said addressing the guests from the Middle East.

'Nevertheless, now we can see a very grave situation in which Christians in the Middle East have found themselves – killings, violence, robberies', he continued, 'We can see an en masse exodus of Christians from the Middle East. It cannot but disturbs us... because lying in the basis of our own identity is Christian culture. And we cannot look, as the phrase is, without tears at what is happening to Christians in the Middle East'.

He also pointed to the importance of hearing an evaluation of the situation in the Middle East made by the heads of the Christian Churches of the region. 'In spite of the fact that in general we are certainly aware of what is going on and of your needs, still it is important to hear your own evaluation of the situation and what we could do additionally to help and support you', President Putin said.
