As His Holiness Patriarch Kirill of Moscow and All Russia noted in his message of greetings, Vladyka Alexander has spent many years of his life serving in the Caucasus and the Transcaucasia region. “This ministry requires special tact and diplomatic skills, for it is carried out in the land where representatives of different religions and nationalities live side by side,” the Primate of the Russian Orthodox Church emphasizes in his letter.

Metropolitan Hilarion of Volokolamsk, chairman of the Moscow Patriarchate’s Department for External Church Relations, also sent a message of greetings to Archbishop Alexander.

“Combining in your work wisdom and simplicity, you confidently steer the church vessel on the waves of the wordly sea, often great and dangerous,” the message states in particular, “The Orthodox Christians living in the diocese that you head have become an organic part of the multi-ethnic family of the peoples of Azerbaijan. No conflicts arise among them, owing to a large extent to the fact that the Orthodox clergymen, as well as representatives of other religions, continuously call upon their faithful to keep peace, as commanded by the Maker.”

Archbishop Alexander conveyed his gratitude to Metropolitan Hilarion of Volokolamsk, saying in particular, “All the years of my service in the Caucasus I have been closely cooperating with the Department for External Church Relations in various spheres, including the interfaith dialogue, which is an important instrument for building up lasting and just peace among people. I hope that our joint work will continue successfully for the good of the Russian Orthodox Church and its flock in Azerbaijan.”
