As Metropolitan Hilarion noted, the Russian Church of St Alexius serves as a historical token of the Russian-German friendship, reminding people of the event which happened two hundred years ago – the Battle of the Nations in which Russian and German soldiers were fighting side by side. According to the DECR chairman, recollections of old glorious days can contribute to the strengthening of relations between the people of two countries. Singing at the requiem service was the Moscow Synodal Choir conducted by Alexei Puzakov.

After the litiya, Metropolitan Hilarion addressed all those present with a homily in which he called the parishioners to revere the memory of the fallen warriors and to cling firmly to the Orthodox faith. Later, Metropolitan Hilarion laid wreaths at the burial place of soldiers and officers of the Russian army.

In the evening, a concert of the Moscow Synodal Choir took place at the Thomaskirche, a Lutheran church in which Johann Sebastian Bach had worked as a cantor. The concert was timed to the celebrations of the centenary of the Memorial Church of St Alexius in Leipzig.
